Portraits Of The Earth:

Portraits of Earth Freeman Patterson, 2002 Freeman Patterson's Portraits of Earth now appearing in a revised edition with a new introduction is an expression of Patterson's vision of Earth. Combining 114 remarkable photographs with a compelling text, he takes readers behind the lens of the camera so that they begin to see the Earth through his eyes, to sense its natural designs, its lines, its textures. It is a compelling photographic portrait of this planet we call Earth. Freeman Patterson lives at Shampers Bluff, New Brunswick, near his childhood home. He has given numerous photographic workshops in the United States, Israel, England, Australia, and New Zealand and has received numerous awards, including in 2001 the Lifetime Achievement Award from the North American Nature Photography Association. He was appointed to the Order of Canada in 1985.

Portraits of the Earth Timothy G. Feeman, 2002 Every map is a tool, a product of human effort and creativity that represents some aspects of our world or universe. This course was powered by the belief that by exploring the mathematical ideas involved in creating and analyzing maps, students would see how mathematics could help them to understand and explain their world. From the Preface, Portraits of the Earth exemplifies the AMS's mission to bring the power and vitality of mathematical thought to the nonexpert. It is designed to teach students to think logically and to analyze the technical information that they so readily encounter every day. Maps are exciting visual tools that we encounter on a daily basis, from street maps to maps of the world, accompanying news stories to geologic maps depicting the underground structure of the earth. This book explores the mathematical ideas involved in creating and analyzing maps, a topic that is rarely discussed in undergraduate courses. It is the first modern book to present the famous problem of mapping the earth in a style that is highly readable and mathematically accessible to most students. Feeman's writing is inviting to the novice yet also interesting to readers with more mathematical experience. Through the visual context of maps and mapmaking, students will see how contemporary mathematics can help them to understand and explain the world. Topics explored are the shape and size of the earth, basic spherical geometry, and why one can't make a perfect flat map of the planet. The author discusses different attributes that maps can have and determines mathematically how to design maps that have the desired features. The distortions that arise in making world maps are quantitatively analyzed. There is an in-depth discussion on the design of numerous map projections, both historical and contemporary, as well as conformal and equal area maps. Feeman looks at how basic map designs can be modified to produce maps with any center, and he indicates how to generalize methods to produce maps of arbitrary surfaces of revolution. Also included are end-of-chapter exercises and laboratory projects. Particularly interesting is a chapter that explains how to use Maple's add-on software to make maps from geographic data points. This book would make an excellent text for a basic undergraduate mathematics or geography course and would be especially appealing to the teacher who is interested in exciting visual applications in the classroom. It would also serve nicely as supplementary reading for a course in calculus, linear algebra, or differential geometry. Prerequisites include a solid grasp of
