Recovery a Feasible Objective for Water and Electricity? Vivien Foster,Tito Yepes,2006 Given the relatively small segment of the population that faces genuine affordability problems in Latin America there appears to be a promising case for using targeted subsidies to reconcile the cost recovery objective with social protection concerns Social tariff schemes of various kinds are already widespread in Latin America but they suffer from a number of design flaws Increasing block tariff IBT structures are the most prevalent form of social tariffs in the region These are likely to be more successful in the electricity sector than in the water sector because the correlation between consumption and income is much stronger in the case of electricity than water Moreover IBT structures in electricity tend to be much better designed than in the case of water with lower fixed charges lower subsistence blocks and steeper gradients A number of more sophisticated social tariff schemes are also being applied that combine consumption criteria with some form of socioeconomic screening These are generally found to perform better than IBTs although they also present significant room for improvement *Annual Report of the Milwaukee County Hospital for the Year Ending ...
