Crip Mothering Mohammed Ali H. Sumili, 2022 Most scholarship on the topic of disability and motherhood tends to be of an empirical nature common to social education and psychology studies Landsman 2008 Wilson and Cellio 2011 Filax and Taylor 2014 Despite the appearance of movies novels and especially memoirs that deal with the subject disability as it engages with motherhood has received scarce attention by feminist motherhood and disability scholarship Prilleltensky 2004 Landsman 2008 Existing literature indicates a gap in studying the joint representation of mothers and disability This study aims to address this gap by analysis of a selection of post 1980 American movies Concentrating on the relation between mother and child as interactional performance Walsh 28 I examine the movies treatment of mothers mediation of disability while they raise and socialize children to meet societal expectations Grounded in a feminist disability framework this research argues that disability enhances rearticulates troubles and undermines dominant concepts of motherhood as an ideology experience and subjectivity Moreover it proposes a theorization of crip mothering as a form of mothering informed by disability as difference and an alternative way of being Scholarly literature concurs that popular cultural images have an ideological force in formulating public conceptual perceptions of the world Kaplan 1992 Hall 1997 Haller 2010 Susan Bordo deploying Foucault contends that popular culture causes the internalization of an intense self surveillance that sustains the efficacy of cultural and societal proscriptions The enduring stereotypical representations of disability and motherhood marginalize and disempower mothers as well as people with disabilities Despite their ubiquitous presence in films they are always assigned subordinate roles Kaplan 1992 Garland Thomson 1997 Both are measured against a predominant norm that precludes their participation in social and economic life Therefore mothers and people with disabilities serve as backgrounds against which able bodied and masculine bodies assert their subject positions
