

are found not only in the West (e.g. near Trier, Tarragona, and Agrigento) but also in profusion throughout Syria and adjoining countries, altar-tombs, and so on. Choice of a particular form seems to have been influenced less by theological considerations than by local traditions and geological factors (e.g. the soft tufa of Etruria and Rome or the sandstone of Petra).

The striking point which emerges from the great wealth of detail which Miss Toynbee supplies is the continuity of tradition, a continuity which is not only temporal but also geographical. However far-flung the ends of the empire might be, some common influences were transmitted throughout it by the activities of merchants, travellers, and soldiers. Thus the Mausoleum of Augustus seems not only to have inspired the resurgence of stone-revetted tumuli in north-western Europe under the Empire (pp. 181 ff.) but also to have endured as long as the age of Theodoric. The walled tomb-enclosure of Italy has its counterpart in the Romano-Celtic precincts of Southfleet and Shorn Bræ. The Etruscan sarcophagus lids with recumbent figures survive in the Roman couches (klinai) on which the statues of the dead recline, and the wax imagines of the middle republic are perpetuated in the sculptured portrait busts of later times, so often set at the entrance of a grave. Nor did Christianity significantly alter the situation. Pagan motifs continued to decorate with optimistic symbolism the last resting-places of the Christian. Perhaps it is the emotional shock of death that makes responses to it so conservative and platitudinous. Even when one has digested all the information assembled by Miss Toynbee, one is little wiser about what Romans actually felt or believed. The feeding-tube to the Caerleon ashes (p. 53, pl. 14) is a starkly pathetic gesture of despair.

A larger book would have lost its sense of scale but even the generous allowance of photographs is hardly adequate where so many monuments have to be described verbally. It is also, perhaps, a pity that Miss Toynbee did not have room to explain fully, with reference to the literary texts, the symbolic or allegorical significance of so many of the particular motifs, used in funerary art—Dionysus, the Seasons, sea-monsters, sphinxes, and the like. Yet we have every reason to be thankful for a magnificent and fascinating book, documented with the most rigorous care.

THIS promised sequel to Rome, the Centre of Power: Roman Art to A.D. 200 (1970) has followed hard on its predecessor's heels. Its main theme is the now not unfamiliar thesis that the gradual, but clearly perceptible, transformation of metropolitan Roman art from Commodus' death onwards is a reflection of the changed mentality, outlook on life, and external circumstances of the later Empire as a whole; and that the break which the later Roman artists made with the formulas of Hellenistic tradition is not to be written off as decadence, but expressed a deliberate preference, in accordance with the spirit of the times,
