Transformations in international politics, conflicts, regionalism, and Latin America comprises articles by twenty-four researchers from several universities who are part of the Development, International Politics and Peace Network from the Capes-Print project. The chapters reflect the plurality of perspectives that define the network, whose objective is to discuss political, cultural, social, and economic processes that affect the development of the world order.

The themes discussed in this book relate mainly to transformations in international relations, especially in the dimensions of security and regionalism that influence Latin America. The guiding axis for reflecting upon theory and action in these areas is the United Nations 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, as recognized by the 2015 General Assembly Resolution.

The past decade has been marked by the growth of rivalries between states, challenges to democracy and plural societies, increasing state and non-state violence, and regional fragmentation. Suppose we intend to construct a resilient world order. In that case, it is crucial to analyze these aspects from plural perspectives and in the local, regional, and global dimensions, bearing in mind two critical facets identified in the 2015 Res-
