

A Review Article

ONE of the most conspicuous developments in the field of international organization since World War II has been the proliferation of regional organizations. In some respects, the post-war regional system could be regarded as an extended version of the concept of military alliance which is virtually as old as the institution of war between political communities; yet it is significantly different. The regional organizations not only cover security agreements but also deal with a broad range of economic, social and political problems. An additional difference is that the regional organizations are not only multilateral but also highly institutionalized in terms of regular meetings of the state-parties, operating budgets and a permanent secretariat staff. These regional groupings bear long and often awkward names including such traditional labels as "league", "organization" and "association" but they are increasingly getting supplemented by such designations as "community" and "union". Although sometimes more accurately reflecting aspirations than reality, the new nomenclature suggests the revolutionary impact of science and technology which has tied together all the peoples of the earth in an unprecedented intimacy of contact, interdependence of welfare and mutuality of vulnerability.

The proliferation of regional organizations indicate that although "one world" has not yet been achieved, there is no denying the existing reality of global interdependence. Indeed, the issue is : Are regional organizations preferable to the global ones for promoting international peace and security, economic and social well-being, human rights and other important goals sought by the international community? Are the activities of universal and regional organizations complementary or conflicting when they pursue their respective objectives in areas where their functions overlap?

A study, or rather a collection of studies, undertaken by the United Nations Institute of Training And Research (UNITAR), Regionalism and the United Nations,* provides enough material for scholars to find an answer to the question. This study, as is characteristic of all UNITAR publications, attempts no definite conclusions of its own. But an overall impression which one gets is that the two—global and regional organizations—are really complementary to each other. This is true to an extent, but the issues involved are too complex and related developments too tortuous to yield a simple answer.

Let us have a look at the United Nations Charter provisions and related developments during the last more than thirty years. To go into historical details would be too involved; nevertheless, the general aspects must be noted.
