

THE ELECTRIFIED STATES OF AMERICA

Electric end use is on the rise. Nearly 40% of homes in the United States are primarily heated by electricity and electric vehicles comprised 3.4% of all light-duty vehicle sales at the end of 2021. Yet, where electric demand is growing and how distribution affects the grid varies from state-to-state.

This map shows the share of electricity to end-use energy in each state.

The more energy-intensive states are those with older buildings, the older stock of cars and trucks, energy-intensive manufacturing, and higher levels of industrial activity. States with lower energy intensity are shown in lighter shades of blue.

At 100%, Vermont has the highest share of home heating electric.

Because the state doesn't generate electricity in California, the state's electricity needs are met by other states.

States that use the least energy are shown in the lightest shade of blue. States with the most energy use are shown in the darkest shade of blue.

States with the highest energy intensity are shown in the darkest shade of blue.

For more on how these figures were calculated, and more on electrification, see Electrifying the Future: Current Trends, Policy Potential, and Research Frontiers. Visit <https://www.eia.gov/energy/future>.
