Trends of research productivity across author gender and research fields: A multidisciplinary and multi-country observational study
(PLOS ONE)

The COVID-19 pandemic meant that many editors had to deal with increased numbers of submissions, while often working under difficult circumstances. A recent analysis in PLOS ONE investigated the changes in publication output — by research field and gender — between 1970 and 2020, with a particular focus on the last couple of years. The key takeaways from the paper for me are:

- The figures in the paper show the growth in article output over time for each Web of Science subject area, which is a helpful resource for publishers looking to compare the growth of their research field with the growth in other disciplines. “Environmental Sciences” and “Engineering Environmental” were the fastest growing research fields.
- In 2020 the number of publications decreased year-on-year for the first time since 2002, presumably because of the pandemic. The authors do not present data for 2021, although it seems highly likely that there was a strong rebound given the increased volume of submissions that many publishers received in 2020.
- Searching for authors by gender is complex and is unlikely to be particularly accurate. “The decrease or increase in research productivity during the first year of the pandemic, in contrast to trends established before 2020, was generally parallel for male and female authors. There has been no substantial gender difference in the disruption due to the pandemic,” say the authors. I suspect this is because many of the papers that academics were writing (while away from the lab) in 2020 were
