

Make Anchors a Part of Your Routines

- ▶ Anchors are part of the classroom-structured routines. The reaction can be either an action (can be observed), or it can take the form of change of inner state (a change in attitude or mood). That is, the anchor results in a change of mental or emotional state, creating a positive expectation (e.g., "It's story time!") The positive expectation is an automatic reaction that we create without using words (Nitsche, 2006). We know that we created an effective anchor when we use the anchor and, as a result, we need to use fewer words (or no words at all) to create the desired mental or emotional state in the child. In other words, an effective anchor is a reflex, the more we use the anchor, the faster it works.
