

Sub-Treasury, a handsome, classic structure, built upon the site of the famed old Federal Hall. Washington was inaugurated as first President upon the very spot where his statue now stands; and now people go to the building to get passports to visit those very foreign lands of which he once warned all of us. You can lunch in aged Pymore Tavern (built in 1790) and afterwards go upstairs and visit the room in which Washington bade good-bye to the officers of his army. The Battery and the Aquarium are not far away, and both have perpetual popularity. Oh, you can really have a fine time downtown. And friends at court may ask you to lunch at one of the smart lunch clubs that occupy the top floors of many of the skyscrapers, serve one fine meal six days a week and call it all a day's work. In the afternoon the captains, the waiters and the chef go to the uptown restaurants.

And you can have a good time uptown. New York's restaurants may not be the best in the world, but they are far from bad. Rapidly they come and go; and rapidly they change favor. Any well-pated man of the town can give you quickly a listing of the best of them.

If you come to the Big City at almost any time of year you will want to see Westchester and the Long Island suburban country, and if you see them any time from late April to late November you will see them at their very best. Some one once called Westchester "the loveliest country in the world," and she has gracefully accepted the appellation.

Certainly there can be few lovelier vicinages of a great world-city than those which the gods gave New York: sweet old Staten Island, with her softly rounded hills and old houses bathing in the fragrance of the near-by sea; the stern sweep of the Palisades; the lovely banks upon either side of the Hudson stream, and of the Long Island Sound as well, and the glorious lush country that lies between. There are broad parkways making egress and ingress for the Big City easier than that of any other large city in the world; in between them gentle, shaded, narrow, twisting roads that

Most of New York's population lives in the lower end of Manhattan Island. The town, a narrow strip of land, is a favorite spot for tourists.
