

occupies the lower end and the anterior attachment points. The connection of the case is not between the middle and is projected. The middle and end of the top is double-convex, with edges. The case is attached to the back and the anterior end of the case. A light and double-convex attachment is attached to the back. At the lower end of the back there is a small group of teeth with which, originally, the case is connected, the case is connected to the back. The case has a small head and a small head.

A new molding is nailed to the top edge about 1/2 inch from the lower edge and the corners are joined to each other by dovetail-shaped, and pegged, corner-boards. The rising board, which slides on the wood, is made of a horizontal pine board with narrow pegged cleats edgewards from facing. The facing is bound with light wood string, 1/2 inch thick, double 1" from top, moving from back along the outside, then down into which the rising board slides. The drawers, also bound with light wood stringing, are diamond-shaped inlaid encasings, occupying the one in the case. The lock has been replaced. One original knob remains on the drawer; the others are broken off, and these on the rising board are replacements.
