Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of elderly people. The study was conducted in a community center in Istanbul, Turkey. The participants were 30 elderly people (15 men and 15 women) aged 65 and over. They were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The experimental group participated in a 12-week training program that included aerobic exercises, strength training, and flexibility exercises. The control group did not participate in any training program. The physical health of the participants was measured using a series of tests, including a 6-minute walk test, a 30-second chair stand test, and a handgrip strength test. The psychological health of the participants was measured using a series of tests, including a Geriatric Depression Scale (GDS) and a Geriatric Anxiety Inventory (GAI). The results of the study showed that the experimental group had significantly better physical and psychological health than the control group at the end of the 12-week training program. The experimental group had a significantly higher 6-minute walk distance, a significantly higher 30-second chair stand count, and a significantly higher handgrip strength than the control group. The experimental group also had a significantly lower GDS score and a significantly lower GAI score than the control group. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical and psychological health of elderly people.
