Abstract

The US Peace Corps has been operating programs globally since 1961 with an enduring mission toward international friendship and world peace structured around clear goals that emphasize cross-cultural learning objectives. Little is known about whether the program has a positive effect on US soft power abroad and, if so, the magnitude of that influence. This paper examines the impact of Peace Corps programming in foreign states on US public diplomacy objectives. The primary research aims to understand the relationship between indicators of a foreign population's favorability toward the US and Peace Corps participation to determine the effects of program size as well as program presence and removal. Pew Research Center US favorability scores were analyzed alongside Peace Corps volunteer cohort sizes between years 2004 and 2016 among 20 sample countries. The findings indicate a positive and statistically significant relationship between the size of the Peace Corps volunteer cohort and US favorability. Each additional volunteer increases favorability toward the US by 0.12 points. The results are robust to the inclusion of additional soft power factors. Supplementary findings illustrate that the removal of Peace Corps programming may adversely impact favorability toward the US, establishing the negative soft power effect of ceasing participation.

Since its founding in 1961, the United States (US) Peace Corps has supplied over 200,000 volunteers to participating countries around the world (Peace Corps 2019b). The agency sends trained men and women to promote mutual understanding between Americans and the people of the host country. At its core, the Peace Corps seeks to build international friendship and by doing so, to promote peace. Although not officially part of the US State Department, the Peace Corps is an excellent example of US public diplomacy (PD) and soft power. In his 2019 book, Cull (2019) categorizes the Peace Corps as an example of “exchange and education public diplomacy”—“officially associated with development work...which also has a secondary public diplomacy impact” (p. 97).

Prompted by the recent decision of the Peace Corps to discontinue operations in China (Peace Corps 2020; Derby 2020), this paper attempts to measure the impact of Peace Corps activity on international attitudes toward the United States and thereby gauge the effectiveness of a long-used, but sometimes controversial, US public diplomacy strategy. The ability to measure the effectiveness and magnitude of public diplomacy activities, including the Peace Corps, is of importance to both government decision-making and scholarship. Therefore, the purpose of this paper is to better understand the impact that the US Peace Corps program has on larger US foreign policy objectives that aim to enhance US favorability abroad as a public diplomacy and national security strategy.

Background

Kennedy asked students at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor if they would be willing to serve their country in the cause of peace in the developing world (Peace Corps, n.d.-c). Later in 1961, President John F. Kennedy's belief that the US needed to be better “at competing with Moscow for the allegiance of newly independent countries” led to the creation of the
