Corruption and citizen participation in local government: Evidence from Latin America

Prior research indicates that corruption hampers economic growth and imposes high social costs. From the perspective of democratic theory, corruption does not just violate the fiduciary obligations with which the public entrusts government officials; it has detrimental effects on the legitimacy of the democratic process as a whole. If citizens view their government as corrupt and dishonest, they become cynical about political life, and as a result, they are less likely to participate in democratic governance. This article examines the effect of corruption—measured through both perception and experience—on citizen participation in local government. Using data from the AmericasBarometer survey on the new democracies in Latin America, we test whether the withdrawal effects registered in terms of participation in elections hold for the participation in city administration. The results show that citizens' willingness to participate in local governance relates positively with their experience of corruption, but not with their perception of corruption.

1 | INTRODUCTION

Prior research indicates that corruption hampers economic growth and increases social cost by creating inefficiencies, deepening inequality, and diverting resources toward sectors with more opportunities for personal enrichment (e.g., Lambsdorff, 2005; Liu & Mikesell, 2014; Shleifer & Vishny, 1993; Uslaner, 2008). Definitions of corruption vary across disciplines as do approaches to combat it (e.g., Neshkova & Rosenbaum, 2015). For economists, corruption is a principal-agent problem, for sociologists it is a social construction, and for psychologists it is a personal disposition.

From the perspective of democratic theory, corruption does not just violate the fiduciary obligations with which the public entrusts government officials; it has detrimental effects on the legitimacy of the democratic process as a whole (Svolik, 2013; Warren, 2004). Scholars studied the impact of corruption on political participation, especially the propensity to vote, and demonstrated how
