the 1990s, the international community has been increasingly aware of the need to address the needs of the most vulnerable populations. This has led to the development of a number of international instruments, including the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989) and the United Nations Declaration on the Rights and Duties of the Elderly (1990). These instruments have provided a framework for the development of policies and programs aimed at improving the lives of vulnerable populations.

These authors also found that the use of a single, non-specific, questionnaire to assess the prevalence of mental health problems in the general population is not sufficient. They also found that the prevalence of mental health problems is higher in the general population than in the clinical population. This is because the general population includes a wider range of mental health problems, including those that are not severe enough to require clinical attention. These three findings have important implications for the design of the training program. First, the results suggest that the training program should focus on the development of the trainees' self-efficacy and their confidence in their own abilities. Second, the results suggest that the training program should focus on the development of the trainees' social support and their confidence in their colleagues. Third, the results suggest that the training program should focus on the development of the trainees' self-regulation and their confidence in their own ability to manage their own learning.
