

rule there must be agreement on who constitutes the people. Terrorist violence often arises where there is no such agreement and hence where democratic procedures cannot yet begin. Violence may not be the only way of pursuing political ends in such cases but sometimes there may be no preferable alternative.

This analysis of terrorism is very suggestive but it is undertaken at a very abstract level. Actual situations of political violence receive only fleeting mentions, despite Gilbert's intention of drawing philosophical concepts from political behaviour. There seems no obvious reason why terrorism and the state response cannot be conceptualized so as to justify the criminalization of terrorism as, say, a defence of individual liberty against attempts to impose a common good in force. As for the supposed logical limit to democracy is this simply a result of equating democracy with majority rule, whereas a richer conception might open up different ways of democratically resolving constitutional conflicts? These questions are left unasked and unanswered.

One comes away from this book with a richer insight into terrorism but with a feeling of frustration and the suspicion that only part of the story has been told. Gilbert concludes on an optimistic note which again seems to rest on shaky foundations. It often appears that the sort of disputes which lead to terrorism are intractable, but Gilbert argues that they are indeed amenable to negotiation. His reason for holding this lies in his assertion that any political community, liberal or not, must guarantee its members the rights of life, liberty, and equal treatment, because these are essential to any communal project. There is thus common ground between competing conceptions of community which can form the basis for the rational resolution of conflicts with the shared aim of improving communal life. This surprising position is barely defended, and obvious difficulties not confronted, such as that the very issue at dispute might be what it means to be free or what equal treatment for groups requires. Moreover it is not clear how this proposition sits in cases where one cause of conflict is unclarity over to what community people belong. This book is one instance where one feels it might have been better had it been longer.

Philosophical Passages: Wittgenstein, Emerson, Austin, Derrida.

by Stanley Cavell

Oxford and Cambridge, Mass.: Blackwell (1995). x + 200 pp.

This book is the fruit of a visit by Stanley Cavell to Bucknell in 1993. Although it is advertised as a book by Cavell, only just over half of the pages are written by him, the remainder consisting of an editor's introduction, transcripts of a seminar and an interview, an essay by Richard Fleming (stylistically indistinguishable from the Master himself), and a complete Cavell bibliography. Actually, there is considerably less 'original' Cavell than that since, as he cheerily points out, his lectures are
