

manuscripts entails an occasional emendation among the forms listed, and in the table of injunctives on pp. 63 ff. a few base verbs are wrongly cited. One remarkable feature which has escaped comment altogether is the double suffix on yāmmiyawāfuttabbāt (p. 61).

A Phonemic Analysis of Bemba: a Presentation of Bemba Syllable Structure, Phonemic Contrasts and their Distribution. By MUBANGA E. KASHOKI. Manchester University Press for the Institute of Social Research, University of Zambia (Zambian Papers, No. 3), 1968. Pp. viii+40. K 1.25, 14s. 6d.

MR. KASHOKI has presented a competent study of Bemba phonology, the first linguistic study of Bemba by a native speaker. It was prepared at Michigan State University under the guidance of Professor Irvine Richardson.

The first chapter, dealing with Bemba phonemes and their allophonic realizations, is highly competent with regard to segmental phonemes. The study was confined to short utterances and the tonological statements are consequently sketchy; 'high mid' tone (or slipped high tone) cannot satisfactorily be left as an allotonic realization of the high toneme, as it can contrast with high tone in contexts where downstep is not automatic. The second chapter concerns the phonemic syllable structure of Bemba. Kashoki defines the syllable as a tone-bearing unit, with the consequence that an utterance like paamad 'hide!' is treated as trisyllabic. Morphotonology does indeed require the recognition of some such unit (which could be called the 'mora'); however, some important distributional statements can be made in terms of the syllable as more usually understood, which the author has unhappily overlooked. The final chapter deals with the distribution of phonemes in consonant clusters and vowel clusters; a full appendix also illustrates successions of consonant (or consonant cluster) and vowel. What Kashoki fails to observe is that before nasal plus consonant (other than semivowel) a vowel is necessarily long, and likewise after consonant and semivowel (except at the end of a word). This last feature also has some bearing on the status of semivowels.

The author has perhaps been less than charitable in describing as 'more traditional' the methods of other linguists who have studied Bemba phonology, if these include the (largely unpublished) work of Professor Malcolm Guthrie and Professor Irvine Richardson. These have rather been products of a pragmatic school of linguistics, which has preferred a morphophonemic (and in part prosodic) approach to a strictly phonemic one, such as Kashoki has proficiently applied. He has indicated that his paper is preliminary to a study of the circumstances governing the fusion and non-fusion of vowels in Bemba. The reviewer would offer him every encouragement to apply his talents to this difficult question.

Fort Hare 1915-48: the Evolution of an African College. By ALEXANDER KERR. London: Hurst, 1968. Pp. x+290, ill. £2. 12s. 6d. (U.K.).

ACHIMOTA, Makerere, Fort Hare: these were magical names in Africa in the twenties and thirties of this century, each in its way an educational El Dorado for ambitious African students. They have all lost, in one way or another, a large measure of their former prominence, though they retain the affection of thousands of alumni all over the continent, as many witnesses continue to testify. Although they are no longer the lonely eminences they once were, it is strange that none of them has yet been honoured either by a 'Festschrift'
