

Educational Psychology and Development Notes

This is a popular motivational theory proposed by psychologist Abraham Maslow in 1943. It applies directly to the role of an educator. While it isn't considered a physical development theory, the base level of needs described is physical needs, and it does involve physical aspects.

Maslow suggested that individuals must satisfy a basic series of needs before they can reach their full potential. Maslow's hierarchy of needs is the basis for the application of Humanism theory in the classroom.

Physiological, safety, love, belonging, and esteem needs compose deficiency needs. Cognitive needs, aesthetic needs, self-actualization, and transcendence are referred to as self-fulfillment or growth needs. The order in which needs being met does not matter, but Maslow theorized that individuals must satisfy their deficiency needs before growth needs.

Since it was originally proposed, Maslow's hierarchy has been extended from five levels to eight to include these additional growth needs – cognitive, aesthetic, and transcendence.
