International Advertising Photography

Photographie publicitaire internationale

I have become aware of the changes that altered the face of American advertising during the time when I joined a firm on Madison Avenue in 1951. At this time, my advertising job, my sole responsibility was to secure advertisements for the magazine in the office and to keep the editor's name pure, clean and clear. From the baby position I was able to see everything that the agency produced, including all the attacks committed. Shortly after beginning this career, I got that first lesson in the education of photography in advertising. David Ogilvy had just completed a comprehensive month study of two identical envelopes for one of his clients. Both carried ideas of his client's and had identical copy, the only difference being in the art treatment: one was photographic and the other direct illustration. Both sets of attacks were top quality, but at issue, in the final result the photographic series completely outdid the other. The reason for believability, timing, identification, etc. What Ogilvy was looking for in research others, like Charles Lane Bennett, were discovering intuitively. In fact by the end of the 1950s Bennett had almost disappeared from most advertising in the United States.

What was the change in American advertising was due in great part to the success and popularity of the picture magazines Look and Life. The editorial technique developed in these magazines, especially the bold use of photography and simple typographic layout, was imitated by some progressive advertising men in the 1950s. Their success in attracting readership began to influence the advertising look of the 1960s. Simple lighting techniques, stronger composition, greater use in cropping, editing, etc., produced photography that made people stop and take notice and, above all, believe. Suddenly a new generation of photographers began to develop. Photographers such as William Pines and Thomas Hall entered the picture, bringing with them a completely new style of realism and humanism. Real faces appeared in humanistic poses, and in the meantime the printing and improved technology of the progressive market and finally the magazine themselves began to improve the standard of their products. All these factors combined to turn the 1960s in U.S. advertising into a photographic boom. And again, as Bennett who before the war was mainly illustration, was now replaced by a new generation of fast-shooting masters of photographic ideas.

The new look in American advertising photography of this period is now the accepted best answer to how. Lighting is basically one source and fairly the problem of how many modeling and control after that comes through the engineering person right up to the printed page. Clarity, when desired, must change and control that resolution. Control is more controlled, with much less variation by the photographer in not allowing the camera to see the world. Clarity is more controlled, with a camera eye not through focus of new photography developments with its extreme wide-angle and telephoto lenses and the very long focal length of the smallest small format cameras.

The 1960s were an exciting time for advertising in the home. The water of pouring in for the time for the advertising world of Europe. Advertising people of the major European magazines have shown a continuous change in the past that in this year. Quality has reached upwards. Competition among European photographers is much better than it has ever been. The demands made by the magazine are greater as they require the better photographs and better printed results in showing ads, make no mistake, their advertising is advertisement photography. Europe with its long tradition of graphic illustration and design has moved not slowly and gradually towards photography, but now, finally, the new market has come time to own and have both the only papers.
