

The extent of pedestrian risk on trunk roads was highlighted by the fact that three out of five male pedestrians risked dying when crossing a road in a rural settlement. Pedestrians between the ages of 14 and 40 were found to be most vulnerable and light vehicles (cars, pick-ups and minibuses) accounted for 70% of vehicles involved in pedestrian accidents. Considering the fact that pedestrian activity at night is less pronounced, it was not surprising that day time accidents dominated but in terms of fatality the risk of a pedestrian death when hit by a vehicle at night was higher than that of the day.

Another dimension to this study was an assessment of the regional differences in the pedestrian accident data. Findings from the investigation were quite revealing as pedestrians within the 15 – 45 age category in the Greater Accra region risk dying or having serious disability when hit by a vehicle than a pedestrian in the same age group in the Upper West region. Motorcycles featured as one of the vehicles mostly involved in pedestrian accidents in the Volta, Northern, Upper East and Upper West regions. This is to be expected because of the high percentage of motorcycles in these regions. The size of the working population and the intensity of social and economic activities had a bearing on degree of pedestrian vulnerability in the Ashanti, Central, Eastern and Greater Accra regions. Again, the increasing risk of pedestrians in rural communities on trunk roads in the Eastern, Central and Ashanti regions was due to the fact that most rural settlements feature roads with limited road-side social and economic activities.

The diversity of risk factors realized in the analysis of the regional accident data not gives an indication of the need to properly contextualize the accident problem for effective diagnosis. Therefore, data collected for the study variables, should be all inclusive and representative of the peculiarities of all segments of the study area. This study used rudimentary techniques to characterize pedestrian accidents. It has also shown the importance of situating the accident investigation to cover all relevant elements of the study domain for meaningful and effective diagnosis of the problem. The method of accident characterization should therefore provide any sophisticated accident investigation method in order to provide insight into the causes for analysis and make informed decisions on intervention strategies.
