

THE PERFORMANCE SCIENCE INDEX:

KITMAN LABS

Benchmarking and Monitoring the Best Performance Sciences Practices of Elite Sporting Teams

By Buckner
A. Armstrong
D. Murray

SPORT SCIENCE CHANGING THE GAME!

Since the arrival of sport science in elite sport nearly two decades ago, this discipline hasn't stopped growing with most elite clubs employing multiple sport scientists, data analysts and external scientific consultants to look at data in search of making a difference and facilitating success.

"The rise of sport science is the biggest and most important change in my lifetime."

Sir Alex Ferguson (2013)

The value of sport science to practical, real-world applications continues to progress as teams apply greater discipline to their sport and performance science practices. However, there is a lack of consensus in terms of industry best practices for these areas.

For this reason, Kitman Labs developed the Performance Science Index™ (PSI) to help teams assess current performance science practices, understand where the gaps are, and leverage global best practices based upon the experiences of Kitman Labs' domain experts.

THIS PAPER INCLUDES:

- Detailed scores and outputs illustrating how the PSI was implemented across several teams working with Kitman Labs.
- A case study of a club that applied performance science practices over the course of a single season, and how this process was monitored by their PSI scores.

APPLICATION OF SPORT SCIENCE TO

REAL-WORLD SCENARIOS

For practitioners, it is often difficult to know where to start, which variables to collect, and how to have an impact on training practices, players' health, and overall team performance.

Monitoring training load, response to training (i.e., wellness and fatigue), sleep and many other performance- and health-related variables has become a common daily practice, primarily due to advances in technology¹. There is also a growing need to register and classify injury data, which helps clubs to benchmark their own incidence and burden in relation to both performance on the pitch and clubs' financial status².

While there is widespread belief that all these human and technological instruments can improve performance, very little is known about the actual sport performance science practices in real-life scenarios in terms of process, variables monitored, and frequency of collection, storage, treatment, and use to make decisions.

Another factor is that adoption rates by high-performance organisations employing data-based decision-making varies widely. It ranges from early-stage sports teams recording basic injury information to those amassing huge volumes of data-points from their athletes across physical, technical and tactical areas on a daily basis.

It is important to note that while sport performance science practices can play a crucial role in an organisation, its effectiveness is entirely dependent upon the approach taken by a club. The right approach is crucial because it informs a team of the analytics options available to achieve the outcomes they want.

To assist in this area, we have put together two useful tools:

1. Practical Guide to Data and Analytics

Analysis For Sport Performance And Health: A Review Check

The first step is getting the strategic view right, i.e., getting alignment around the role of data and analytics in the organisation, focusing on the right questions and understanding the purpose of data and how it will make the organisation better over time. Once these fundamentals are in place—and this can be a long process—attention should then turn to data collection.
