

A Man Called Cervantes

By BRUNO FRANK

"A certain strong man," says Carlyle, "brought smoothly at Lapon, worked slowly as an Algerian slave; with most choicest-colored fancies and nakedness and the world's ingratitude; and seeing no goal, with one hand left him, wrote our jehizim, and all but our deepest, modern book, and named it Don Quixote."

For a time it was known that here about the man called Cervantes. Yet his name has been and by millions shows the centuries, and now today in their number speak in the name of his chief character without remembering a name. Bruno Frank's work has been to catch the man's essential spirit. No novelist could have been better suited to his gifted and subtle pen. His scene is that of the time of the Armada, with its high court and beggarly populace, its mystery and mysterious king. His position here gave to him in the romance of a great figure, he fights the Turks in the bloody sea-battle of Lepanto; he is captured by Barbary pirates and spends many years in prison; he escapes, he escapes the death and punishment; he has a great love-affair while sleeping; he is finally set free, a prisoner, to write his immortal book. "That here is the end, a little like his hero, with 'that noble and famous' name, already in an exceptional audience of postmodern and modernism."

Now Bruno Frank gives us in Cervantes a lively and human character against the stark rigidity of an age of magnificent extremes. It is a book which should read one to know the small but unshakable group of Frank's admirers in America.
