Maine Cottages John M. Bryan, Fred L. Savage, 2005-04-07 Robert R Pyle Our sense of place and community is made up of memories personal memories of first hand experience oral memories that recount our ancestors experiences and formal codified civic memories set down in laws ceremonies and rituals Together they are vital building blocks of citizenship In a vivid and meaningful way this book preserves memories relevant to understanding the roots of communities on Mount Desert Island Maine The surnames of many of Mount Desert's earliest settlers are still found in today's telephone directories In these families many oral traditions are passed down from generation to generation building outward from a historical core like the rings of a tree Dad used to farm this field Fred L Savage's great nephew Don Phillips told me once gesturing toward an alder growth His father grew vegetables for the hotel and my great grandfather grew grains This road used to go right on up over the hill and they used it to move the cemetery up there from where the hotel is now Describing the field Don ignores the alders and the towering evergreens beyond them for in his mind's eye he sees yellow waving wheat and rye bare ground and a narrow cart track leading up the hill into the distance on which his ancestors transported the remains of their own forebears to a new resting place Oral traditions living memory set the stage for him and he accepts the reality of things he has never seen
