1. Introduction

Probabilistic Safety Assessment is a standardized tool for assessing and improving nuclear power plant safety (ASME RA-S-2002, 2002; S-294, 2005; RA-S-2008, 2008). It is also used for assessment and improvement of the reliability of various systems in other industries, e.g. air and space industry and chemical industry. For the case of new nuclear power plants it may be required as a part of the safety analysis report, which is the main document needed for licensing of the plant operation.

2. History and State of the Art

Probabilistic risk analysis or probabilistic safety assessment has developed significantly in the last five decades from its first steps (Keller & Modarres, 2005), when the report known as WASH-740 was written in the year 1957 (WASH-740, 1957).

The term probabilistic risk analysis was more used in United States of America, while term probabilistic safety assessment was more used in Europe. Sometimes, the term probabilistic safety assessment was even used to specify only the systems reliability and accident sequences up to the core damage frequency, which may only refer to level 1, while the term probabilistic risk analysis was used to specify also the containment systems, which may refer to level 2, and consequence analysis, which may refer to level 3, in addition (NUREG/CR-2300, NUREG/CR-2815, 1985).

The WASH-740 study focused on the undesired consequences of large loss of coolant accident as the leading source of the worst radiation release into the environment.

A decade later, the risk curves were developed, which showed the small risk of nuclear power plants compared to other risks including risk caused by human activities and risk caused by nature itself (Farmer, 1967).

A report WASH-1400 was written in the year 1975 and a large debate followed about the applicability of the methods and results (WASH-1400, 1975). When the accident at Three Mile Island happened, it was soon concluded, that suggestions of WASH-1400 were very useful and wider applicability of the methods and results followed in the United States of America in order to prevent similar and other accidents (NUREG/CR-2300, 1982; NUREG/CR-2728, 1983; NUREG/CR-2815, 1985). Similarly, more efforts were put to
