European Security: New Challenges and Prospects for Co-operation

New threats after the Cold War have imposed a claim for new instruments of prevention and defense, consequently changing security relations between states and their co-operational perspectives. The future of European security had become very obscure.

The main purpose of the article is to estimate the process and perspectives of the institutionalization of the European security system. The first part of the article is devoted to major changes in the global security agenda after the Cold War. Factors, which influence or might influence security of the European region, are identified. Analysis of possible institutionalization of the regional security system in Europe is conducted in the second part. In two last parts the article looks at the opportunities of the NATO and the EU to become the cornerstones of an effective European security system.

European history is a history of the rise and fall of civilizations, a history of permanent wars, conflicts, peace agreements, state coalitions, etc. Major developments in Europe have always had a strong influence on other parts of the world. Europe can also be associated with culture, progress and values that for centuries have influenced the development even of the farthest corners of the planet.
