Abstract:

Utilizing a cross-sectional qualitative design, this study examined how the Chimbu provincial government systems in Papua New Guinea (PNG) employed communication strategies as cultural tools in the delivery of services to constituents in remote rural areas. Participants were asked to reflect on the effectiveness of governmental communication strategies in engaging local communities during the Covid-19 pandemic. Despite weaknesses, the study finds that the PNG government employed a comprehensive communication strategy to control infections in communities. It provided concise messaging to ensure local communities adhered to Covid-19 protocols, such as hand washing, social distancing, masking, and vaccinating while collaborating with other agencies to enhance messaging. The study also demonstrates how both the government and opposition collaborated for public safety during the pandemic.

Introduction

Public health policy requires a high degree of coordination between central and local governmental bodies. Tradeoffs between control and flexibility, oversight, and independence, affect how effectively strategic goals may be achieved. The Covid-19 pandemic presented significant challenges to government bureaucracies across the globe. Central governments had to coordinate with local leaders and stakeholders for efficient and effective implementation of public health measures to fight the spread of the virus.

PNG comprises mainland New Guinea, including the lower mainland called Papua region, and a range of islands called the island regions. Papua New Guinea gained independence
