Imagists about Pope's Essay on Criticism

Although Alexander Pope and Ezra Pound wrote in different centuries to prove the success of their eras, Enlightenment and Imagism, respectfully, their works could have many things in common. The representatives of the Augustan Age valued reason and independence, while the Imagists saw individualism through the prism of simplicity and clarity. Pound was definite and scarce in her words compared to Pope, who used many abstract phrases and objective opinions. Therefore, most Imagists would have thought that Pope did not have a clear suggestion and recommended removing unnecessary discourse and sentiments in his "Essay on Criticism."

The Enlightenment movement was known for the desire of poets to obtain reason in political, religious, and philosophical discussions. "An Essay on Criticism," written by Pope at the beginning of the 18th century, was inspired by the necessity to change something and help people become better. Instead of giving clear reasons and explanations of the problem, many general concepts like "glitt'ring thoughts," "glaring chaos," and "naked nature" are observed in his poem (Pope). The poet is not afraid to introduce new thoughts and compare poets to "unskill'd to trace/The naked nature" painters (Pope). All these examples create a solid basis for criticism and the necessity to impose limitations by Imagists.

Imagism was founded in the early 20th century and characterized by simple language, clarity in statements, and visualization of ideas. In other words, if Enlightenment poetry was exalted and abstract, Imagist poetry was proved to be detailed and concrete. In her poem, Pound described the character who walked in "Kensington Gardens... dying piece-meal/of a sort of emotional amenia" (415). There is no need to have several people with the same problem but to introduce one person and show his/her significance clearly. A similar style is observed in Amy Lowell's "Aliens," whose "spirit crumbles at their [little people] teasing touch" (46). There is no need for lengthy descriptive lines for the Imagists to create a story.
