Psychiatric Peer Review: A Current Perspective

By MARTIN G. ALLEN, MD

In the past dozen years, the process of reviewing medical care by peers has grown into a major activity. Psychiatry has been part of this process to assess medical necessity for care, appropriateness of care given in each specific situation, length of that care, and the necessity for the continuation of that level of care over the duration of treatment.

The peer review procedure evolved because of the requirements for third party payers (eg, government programs and insurance companies) to discharge their obligations in a prudent manner, emphasizing medical necessity and cost efficiency. In addition, the peer review process is concerned with the study of treatment to clarify patterns of care and appropriateness in delivery of that care with the hope and expectation that increased quality and efficiency of psychiatric care will result. The peer reviewer also provides a consultation with the goal of improving the quality of care delivered. Consequently, there is an educational-consultational component to the peer review process.

Reports have described issues, patterns, and results of the peer review process in psychiatry¹⁻²⁶ and some of these reports have described specific cases as examples of the kinds of problems encountered in psychiatric peer review,²¹⁻²⁵ and the types of decisions which have been made about specific cases.

In general, a peer reviewer has the option of making one of the following decisions: to certify the full treatment, give a partial certification, reject the treatment as inappropriate or unnecessary, or ask for more information in order to give a fair and complete review of the case.

Insurance carriers need information to carry on their function in an efficient and cost effective manner in order to provide adequate mental health benefits to subscribers. Specifically, the insurance companies need to know: 1) if the patient is
