greatly increase confidence in their own work and responsibility for it. It is quite possible that a supervisor who always treats people as if they are capable of doing the job will not only increase their self-motivation, but will also increase their productivity. In fact, the research of Herzberg and his colleagues has shown that the most important factor in determining job satisfaction is the nature of the work itself. People who are given jobs that are challenging and that require them to use their own initiative and creativity are more likely to be satisfied with their work and to perform better than those who are given jobs that are routine and that require little or no thought or initiative. This is why it is so important for supervisors to give their people jobs that are challenging and that require them to use their own initiative and creativity. It is also why it is so important for supervisors to give their people jobs that are meaningful and that give them a sense of purpose. When people are given jobs that are challenging, meaningful, and that give them a sense of purpose, they are more likely to be satisfied with their work and to perform better than those who are given jobs that are routine and that require little or no thought or initiative.
