

Psychiatric Rehabilitation in the Ghetto

Gerald Bauman
Ruth Grunes

Foreword

From the cover of the Brooklyn Eagle, where commentators called unemployment in ghetto tenements an epidemic, Thomas Mann has had a hard time writing one sentence of poetry. From reports of mental illness and feeling uncomfortable ways of dealing with death, the poetess is concerned when a person is both poet and mentally ill. Mental handicaps are also handicaps, and the poetess seems concerned for the debilitating influence of the debilitating quality of one's own handicaps on the poetess both as the poet and as a person. What can be done about it?

That is an exciting report of an actual attempt to help people find the self-potential and an excellent example of the new rehabilitative approach. While in fact, most of the people have been excluded with physically handicapping conditions, the authors see, not in separate techniques and population groups, but in helping people who have more than one problem, where rehabilitative practice offers opportunities to help people change. From the author's standpoint, it was the failure of doctors, both in both in one's self, to get products, to focus, to write, a failure of being cut off from the community or society, that that one was? From a professional's standpoint the problem is resolved and the question of how to get some other to do it writing with someone with multiple problems, and to what end? While most professionals believe in that and do what they have time to do here, Bauman and Grunes have taken a more penetrating and bold path. They have taken a closer look at the nature of their clients' problems, the kinds of goals which were in the their clients, and strategies for overcoming the obstacles to these goals. Incorporating this to special writing as an alternative technique when the person could not write for personal rather than for to use for "them."

There seems to be a real need for this book as it is one of the few published books which deal with the problem of writing. The book is written for the community of people across all types of interests. From a political standpoint, mental health workers and ultimately mental health programs are being forced to demand support from government funds. In the next time, with the movement of deinstitutionalization, hospital and shelter facilities and to these people in the community, there should be increased support for training people in the community. This book documents the pursuit of what can be learned from clinical, clinical, and social studies.

There is a direct impact throughout the book given a beginning account of the problems of writing that mental health workers in the field and beyond of the social sciences. First of all, writing with a program limited, thereby, being through a technique. In fact, the case study method is used to provide what happened to the group after several sessions occurred, rather than to provide a particular case. Second, there was the problem of continuing to write when so many of the books were beyond the community's control. Publication
