Psychiatric disorders in adolescents and young adults with Down syndrome and other intellectual disabilities

Elisabeth M. Dykens^{1,2*}, Bhavik Shah³, Bruce Davis¹, Courtney Baker¹, Taylor File¹ and Jeri Fitzpatrick¹

Abstract

Background: Relative to other aspects of Down syndrome, remarkably little is known about the psychiatric problems experienced by youth and young adults with this syndrome and if these problems differ from others with intellectual disabilities. Yet adolescence and young adulthood are particularly vulnerable time periods, as they involve multiple life transitions in educational, medical, and other service systems.

Methods: This study compared the psychiatric diagnoses of 49 adolescent and young adult patients with Down syndrome to 70 patients with other intellectual disabilities (IDs). The groups were similar in age, gender, and level of intellectual impairment. The 119 participants, aged 13 to 29 years ($M = 21$) were evaluated in one of two specialized psychiatric clinics.

Results: In contrast to previous literature, those with Down syndrome versus other IDs had significantly higher rates of psychosis NOS or depression with psychotic features (43% versus 13%). Unlike the ID group, psychosis was predominantly seen in females with Down syndrome. Marked motoric slowing in performing routine daily activities or in expressive language was manifested in 17% of patients with Down syndrome. No group differences were found in anxiety or depressive disorders, and the ID group had significantly higher rates of bipolar and impulse control disorders.

Conclusions: These preliminary observations warrant further studies on genetic, neurological, and psychosocial factors that place some young people with Down syndrome or other IDs at high risk for severe psychiatric illness.

Background

A growing literature describes the behavioral phenotypes of people with neurodevelopmental disorders, but not all neurodevelopmental disorders receive equal research attention. Down syndrome, for example, is understudied both in relation to rare, clinically severe disorders and to more prevalent conditions such as autism spectrum disorders, or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder [1]. Not surprisingly then, research gaps are increasingly identified in the Down syndrome literature [2,3].

One salient research gap concerns co-occurring mental health disorders in Down syndrome and how these are manifested in different age groups [2]. Older adults with Down syndrome, for example, are relatively well studied because of their increased risks of Alzheimer's disease, attributed to the third copy and overexpression of the amyloid precursor protein gene on chromosome 21 (for a review, see Zigman [4]). Depressive symptoms in this older age group have also been described, and careful evaluations are necessary to differentiate a depressive disorder from the early clinical signs of dementia [5]. On the other end of the developmental spectrum, young children with Down syndrome appear to have lower overall rates of disruptive behaviors as well as distinctive social, motivational, and attention profiles [6-8]. In contrast to older adults or children, remarkably
