Abstract

The monIT project provides public information on population exposure to electromagnetic fields (EMF) from mobile communication systems in Portugal. The monitoring system is based on a network of autonomous remote probing stations, and also on an extensive EMF sounding program, both carried out in public areas across the country. Measured results are automatically uploaded to a Web site for public dissemination (<http://www.bui.pt/monit>), which also includes other relevant information about EMF for the general public. This paper describes the project's structure, the automatic monitoring system, the project's activities, and, finally, it presents a brief analysis of the measured results.

Keywords: Biological effects of electromagnetic radiation; electromagnetic fields; risk analysis; land mobile radio cellular systems; land mobile radio; mobile communication; monitoring

1. Introduction

The monIT Project is being developed within the Instituto de Telecomunicações (IT) Lisbon site at the Instituto Superior Técnico (IST, Technical University of Lisbon, Portugal). This is a nonprofit scientific research and development institute, with activities in the area of telecommunications.

The monIT Project started in 2003, in the context of an urgent general public concern about possible health hazards caused by radiation from mobile-communication-systems antennas. Most of the time this was rooted in misconceptions about the aspects involved, aggravated by the lack of trusted sources of information capable of presenting needed information in a simple, understandable way.

As objective evaluation of the risk requires the quantification of electromagnetic field (EMF) levels to which the population is exposed, systematic information of this type was not openly available in Portugal. This was one of the gaps that the monIT Project filled in, by providing results from extensive measurement campaigns performed in public places, near base stations of mobile communication systems (i.e., GSM and UMTS, without restriction on the type of cell), over the country for a period that currently amounts to more than three years. The project also produces and disseminates information written in common language to help the clarification of public opinion about relevant aspects of exposure to EMF originated by mobile-communication systems, from an engineering perspective. The dissemination of this information is made through the project's Web site, <http://www.bui.pt/monit>, which is dynamically updated with data from remote monitoring stations and from manual measurement campaigns. The project team is also involved in direct public-information actions, and in basic context for health personnel about the engineering perspective of EMF in mobile communications.

The monIT Project is sponsored by the three mobile operators that are licensed in Portugal (Optimus, TMN, and Vodafone Portugal). However, by contract the sponsors have no intervention with or any form of authority over the project's management, its activities, or the published results.

This paper is organized as follows: The next section presents a general overview of the monIT Project, and the subsequent section is dedicated to the description of the measurement system and protocol. This is followed by a discussion of the measurement results and, finally, some conclusions are drawn.
