

ity as the circumstances required. While Cell does his best with the materials available, it must be said that Hailey remains a somewhat shadowy, one-dimensional figure throughout the book. We are given occasional glimpses of personal sadness and family tragedy. However there is no fund of reminiscence, diary confession, anecdote or table talk to bring Malcolm Hailey alive on the page. Even as a public figure, where his social and debating skills were clear assets, he is seen largely through his reports and speeches.

In the later 1930s, Hailey's prestige as a ruler and adviser to the British government was transferred to the cause of African research and colonial reform. Cell, in a fascinating chapter, shows that Hailey's time as director of his famous African Survey was actually one of acute personal crisis ending in complete breakdown. To a large degree, he was a victim of his own methodical, perfectionist work habits. But while his contribution to the finished product was modest, and the significance of the volume has been exaggerated, its very appearance allowed him to emerge as the leading authority on colonial development and African administration during the following decade. Cell is correct in underlining Hailey's importance as an adviser on and propagandist for British colonial policy during the Second World War, though it is misleading to state that Hailey was ahead of government thinking in pressing for regional councils in 1942. After 1943, Hailey's influence began to decline, and while still consulted by governments, he never again found himself at the centre of things. He spent the last twenty years of his life revising his writings and looking on with a mixture of sadness and horror as the empire fell to pieces. Cell's study may not be able to tell all we want to know about Hailey the man, but it fulfils a major need in documenting and illuminating the career of Hailey the imperialist.

It is surprising but still true to remark that the study of international air transport and civil aviation remains outside the mainstream of political historiography despite the revolutionary impact of global air communications in the twentieth century. One can also note that however esoteric the field might be to some, it has an impressive pedigree of scholarship dating back at least to 1942 with the publication of Oliver Lissitzyn's classic study, International Air Transport and National Policy. He rightly first identified the critical relationship of politics and airline operations, a theme pursued more recently in studies by Gidwitz (1980), Sampson (1984), and Mackenzie on the Canadian experience (1987). Peaceful Air Warfare, the title an oxymoron rather too contrived, is of this tradition, adding a new chapter with its focus
