

PEAR PSYLLA INTEGRATED PEST MANAGEMENT

Introduction

Pear psylla (Cacopsylla pyricola [Foerster] [Hemiptera: Psyllidae]) is an important pest of pear in Washington. Honeydew produced by pear psylla causes fruit russet, and serious infestations can stunt and defoliate trees.

History

Pear psylla likely arrived in the United States along with shipments of pear nursery stock from western Europe. It was first found in Connecticut in 1832 and spread to Washington State by 1939 (Westigard et al. 1979). Within a few years it became a serious pest throughout all pear growing areas in the Pacific Northwest.

Hosts

In the Pacific Northwest, pear psylla is a pest only of pear. Several other plants are transitory hosts and overwintering sites for winterform pear psylla adults. Pear psylla adults may feed on other deciduous fruit trees including apples, conifers and shrubs as they disperse from pear orchards in the fall and return in the spring (Horton et al. 1994; Cooper et al. 2019). However, pear psylla does not reproduce on these transitory hosts (Kaloostian 1970; Cooper et al. 2019).

Life Stages

Egg: The egg, shaped like a grain of rice, is attached to the host by a small protrusion extending from the rounded end and inserted into host tissue. The egg is creamy white when laid but turns yellow to orange as it develops (Figure 1).

Nymph: The nymph passes through five stages (instars). The first instar is translucent yellow. It is somewhat cylindrical in shape and about the size of the egg. Each successive instar is larger, flatter and more oval than the previous instar. The fourth instar nymph is yellowish green to light tan. The fifth instar is dark green to dark brown and often referred to as the hardshell stage. Wing pads are noticeable on third instars and get progressively larger on fourth and fifth instars (Figures 1–3).
