

Carbon Dioxide Removal (CDR) refers to a range of technologies and approaches designed to remove and store CO₂ from the atmosphere, helping to reduce the overall concentration of greenhouse gases. CDR can take many forms, from the burial of plant matter which slows decomposition to direct air capture. CDR, alongside rapid and deep decarbonization, is necessary to meet our climate targets. This online tool provides an overview of the opportunities for CDR deployment in individual U.S. states, highlighting both the opportunity for various CDR approaches and the enabling policies that support their implementation.

Average Opportunity Rating by State

Opportunity Ratings shed light on the potential for a state to do a certain type of CDR. These scores are based on metrics related to natural resources, existing infrastructure, and other factors that already exist in a state.

Average Enabling Policy by State

Enabling Policy Ratings illuminate policy that is currently working for or against CDR deployment in a state. These scores are not related to the potential for a state to do CDR but rather the enabling regulatory and legislative environment. Is a state governing CDR well? Are permitting pathways clear? Is there

Average Rating by State (lowest = 1.0, highest = 3.0)*

*This legend shows continuous ratings rather than discrete ratings of low, medium, or high, because it is the average of several separate ratings.

The Atlas is a living tool that will be updated as more data becomes available and as the CDR industry scales or relevant policy is passed. To this end, if you have feedback of any kind, please do not hesitate to share it with Kyle Clark-Sutton (kyle@suttonclimate.com) and Isabel Wood (isabel@suttonclimate.com).
