

Summary of Permaculture Principles

from Introduction to Permaculture by Bill Mollison

1. Relative Location: Seek to build working relationships between each element so that the needs of one element are filled by the outputs of another element. Core of Permaculture is Design; design is a connection between things. To enable a design component to function efficiently, we must put it in the right place.

- Ⓢ Functional Analysis: is a tool to realize the full potential of each element by examining products and behaviors, needs, and intrinsic characteristics.

2. Each Element Performs Many Functions: Each element in the system should be chosen and placed so that it performs as many functions as possible. Use relative location so elements with diverse functions have their qualities perpetuated.

3. Each Important Function is Supported by Many Elements: Important basic needs such as water, food, and fire protection should be served in two or more ways.

4. Efficient Energy Planning: Zone and sector placement with slope and other factors are taken into consideration for maximizing our time, energy, and monetary resources.

- Ⓢ Zone Planning refers to the placement of elements based on their intensity of use and management.
- Ⓢ Sector Planning is about placing design components to manage incoming wild energies to our advantage or to mitigate their affects.
- Ⓢ Slope means looking at a site in profile to maximize energy flow- i.e. gravity and convection.

5. Using Biological Resources: Is the key strategy to develop sustainable systems, save energy and do the work of the farm. Their building up on location is a long-term investment, they have to be managed carefully, and their integration needs to be thoroughly considered in the planning period and during their usage careful management and adherence to proper timing is essential.

- Ⓢ Animal Tractors: use animals to clear land, such as chickens in the garden, goats on a bramble patch, or pigs to help turn over a potato field.
- Ⓢ Pest Control: integrate plantings of specific plants to create refuges for beneficial insects such as those from the plant families of aster, umbel, and mint. Additionally design in bird and bat houses, rock and stick piles as well as large hollow logs to create habitat for various species such as small reptiles.
- Ⓢ Fertilizers: use the manure from animals to create soil as well as diverse plantings that include nitrogen fixing plants (alfalfa, clover, black locust) as well as dynamic accumulators (comfrey) so that chop and drop can be employed.

6. Energy Cycling: Permaculture systems intend to stop the flow off of energies from the site and instead turn them into cycles. The interaction between plants and animals produces energy, which is caught, stored, used and re-cycled. Incoming energy –sun, water, wind, manures– are used at its highest possible use, then its next highest, and so on.
