An Inclusive Father's Day Teacher Guidance

Careers of inclusion children often get the extra mile, so it is great to take this opportunity to let them know they are appreciated. We all want to make Father's Day special for those who care for our inclusion students, but it can be difficult to get them involved. You may have students who are aware of sensory based activities or who don't cope with changes in school routine. See below for some helpful and meaningful ways students can be supported to show their appreciation for Dads, grandparents, uncles and other special people.

Tip 1: Make it Meaningful

Resist the temptation to make the forced card. Don't give it to the competition with the class next door or who can make the most amazing card. It needs to come from the students. They want to feel like they are involved and that Dads and special people do too.

- Work with a child's preferred activities. You may have a few different things going on, but this is the best way to have children engaged and motivated in the activities. You might have a few stations for painting, one for colouring, and one with craft items.
- Allow children to have a choice. Let them choose the colour of card or paint, have them pick the picture or support them to use AAC to write a sentence. This adds meaning for them and for Dad.
- Keep it simple. Dads don't need a Van Gogh, they just want something handmade or meaningful. It can be as easy as a frame with a photo of them engaged in learning.
- If you are sending home a card or a gift it is great to add a photo of the student involved in the process, even if it is just taking the spoon after cooking!

Tip 2: Be organised
