William Horace George

Scientist In Action:

Science in Action Bruno Latour, 1987 A foundational text of science and technology studies from the field's most celebrated theorist Science and technology have an immense impact on every aspect of society but how exactly are scientific facts produced In this lively and authoritative classic Bruno Latour reveals that social context is as important as technical content when it comes to understanding how science works Latour's focus is not on what scientists say but on what they do from the day to day practice of gathering data and writing technical papers to the travel and networking required to secure funding Observing the scientific enterprise with the analytical distance of an ethnographer participating in a foreign culture he argues that science is driven not by value neutral discoveries of objective truths and natural laws but by the elaboration of longer and stronger networks encompassing both people and things Only by mobilizing a wide range of human and nonhuman actors fellow scientists bureaucrats specimens instruments calculation devices texts microbes can fact builders successfully accumulate the authority needed to convert a novel tendentious claim into an accepted truth Setting a pioneering agenda for the social studies of science Science in Action marshals a wealth of vivid examples to challenge conventional disciplinary boundaries and introduce readers to the disorienting conceptual universe of actor network theory Playful irreverent and unremittingly provocative it remains among Latour's most significant works The Scientist in Action
