Problems and Cures

Sample one shows the imprecise lines caused by barely perceptible bubbles trapped in size which has not aged long enough. In Woodside, I must wait a day and a half to two days after mixing the size or the lines of my patterns would be this fuzzy.

On the other hand, size which is too old will not hold combed patterns; wavy lines like those in sample two are the result. The age factor seems to depend upon both temperature and amount of use. In hot weather the size ages more rapidly. In cool weather I can do combed patterns for a week and then do stone patterns for several days after that.

Sample three shows what happens if the paper is still wet from the alum solution. The ink will not adhere to wet spots. It usually takes twenty or thirty minutes for a sponged sheet to absorb the alum. The paper should be damp but not wet.

The line in sample four was caused by a hesitation while laying down the paper. The sheet must be lowered down onto the size in one smooth, continuous motion. Another common problem when laying down paper is the pig's eye, a round blank space in the pattern, caused by a bubble trapped between the size and the paper. Controlling the flexibility and the flatness of the paper by placing plywood on the stack of dampened sheets should help prevent any trapped bubbles. Practice in laying down the paper will help, too.
