ABSTRACT

Psychoanalytic theory seeks to explain how personality develops with a focus on motivation, emotions, and other internal aspects. Essentially, psychoanalysis is the result of Freud's ideas about the power of preconscious structures (id, ego, and superego) in controlling human behavior. The implication is that human behavior is controlled by preconscious structures, manifested as imitations, with their control lying in lost childhood memories. The method used in this writing is a literature review, involving a critical analysis of written sources (literature) on a specific topic, enabling the creation of summaries, classifications, comparisons, or even evaluations. Freud believed that humans are constantly driven by a desire for pleasure. However, what one encounters in the external world may not always be an ideal condition that supports these drives. Hence, the idea of a conflict between these drives and the external world arises. This notion led Freud to the concept most famous among his others: the three points of human personality as the Ego (Latin for "I"), Superego (Latin for "above/I above"), and Id (Latin for "this/it"). Freud categorized character development into three stages: infantile (0-5 years), latent (5-12 years), and genital (12 years). The psychoanalytic theory introduced by Freud helps understand human personality and categorize normal and pathological behaviors. Freud believed that humans always experience conflicts, both internal and external, that must be resolved to achieve balance.

1. INTRODUCTION

Discussing Psychoanalytic Theory feels impossible without discussing Sigmund Shlomo Freud, an Austrian neurologist labeled as the Father of Psychoanalysis himself. The author first encountered Sigmund Freud in a religious study, where one of the speakers criticized Freud's perspective, considering religious behavior equivalent to mental illness a viewpoint that seems to have been widely examined scientifically [1].

Sigmund Freud was born in Freiberg, Moravia, Austria, and passed away in London, England, at the age of approximately 80. Throughout his life, Freud held titles such as doctor, psychiatrist, scientist, and, of course, psychologist. Freud himself proposed that psychoanalysis falls under the realm of psychology; not medical psychology, nor mere psychology that investigates whether something is normal or abnormal. For Freud, Psychoanalysis is a theory of personality [2].
