ABSTRACT

Pesticides usage has gradually augmented and evolved ever since their initial application in the middle of the 20th century. Currently, usage of pesticides is an indispensable tool for escalating the crop yield as well as protection of economically important crops. Conversely, these pesticides are a major cause of pollution in aquatic and soil ecosystems and most of the pesticides belong to groups that are generally persistent and toxic. Persistent pesticide residues that accumulate and magnify over time, have adverse impacts on environmental and human health. Subsequently, systematic surveillance and management of pesticide utilization is crucial. Conventional methods aimed to eradicate pesticide residues are inefficient and presently bioremediation of these pollutants is a theme of attention with reference to ecological cleaning. This chapter gives an overview of potential “microbioremediation” strategies and use of potential microalgal–bacterial–fungal consortia for recuperation of pesticide polluted freshwater and soil environments. Information about potential microbial consortia that can be availed for remediation of range of pesticides can serve as baseline data for formulation of various remediation strategies and pesticide management projects.
