

Everybody needs self-management skills

Self-management is the ability to plan, direct, monitor and modify our behaviour - with the aim of smooth work and wellbeing at work. It is also the ability to control our thoughts and emotions.

Everybody needs self-management skills - regardless of their job or position in the work community.

Self-management is a parallel phenomenon to external leadership. Both are necessary. Everybody should know, for instance, who will decide what to do when people disagree on things.

What does self-management mean in practice?

Self-management means being goal-oriented and methodical. A person who manages themselves sets personal goals at work while considering the fundamental task and common goals of their work community. They plan their working days or shifts, on a weekly level or over a longer time range. Attention should be paid for instance to setting reasonable goals, anticipating peak times and supporting recovery both during working hours and outside of work.

Weekly planning can follow the "1-3-1" principle, for instance, where the aim is to

- reserve enough time to work on something bigger and important
- complete one thing every day and
- do something every day that supports personal wellbeing and the ability to cope.

Self-management means making choices and prioritizing. This requires everyone to be clear on their powers and responsibilities, in addition to the goals. Self-management also includes the ability to accept the boundaries within which you can decide on the methods and order of your work.

Self-management means managing interruptions. Eliminating unnecessary interruptions and focusing on one thing at a time facilitates smooth work. Workplaces should agree on ways to reduce interruptions together. Keeping the work environment free from distractions and having functional tools to work with is also important.

Self-management means recognizing progress and making it visible. A person who manages themselves regularly stops to assess their progress and recognize their successes. In addition to their strengths, they can identify areas of development. They are able and willing to request, receive and act on feedback. They also have the courage to seek help.

It is easier to make progress visible if work packages are divided into smaller elements. In addition to a to-do list, you could write a "done list" at the end of the week.

Self-management means making sure you recover from work. Recovery is difficult to store up, so you should recover
