

AWPL continues to guide the program's conceptual framework, enhancements emerge as the program strives to be responsive to current research, standards, emerging/promising practices, and the changing contexts of the program and early childhood field.

While the mission statements of the college and program lay the foundation for our work, the philosophy, guiding principles, and our program standards help to fulfill it. The program philosophy expands on the mission and guides the program design, structure, and content. Our current philosophy states:

We believe every child uses the arts as symbol systems to construct and express knowledge and feelings. As a result, arts expression and interpretation are included in the pedagogy of the early childhood education program as a form of literacy. Engagement in the arts also provides children, students, and faculty an inclusive, innovative process for developing creative and critical thinking skills and gaining the ability to use multiple perspectives to appreciate and value others.

Our program is based on principles of child development and Universal Design for Learning. Students learn that responsive teaching and caring for each child requires thoughtful and collaborative planning based on objective observations and assessments of learning in the context of cultural, linguistic, and ability diversity. They learn to foster respectful, reciprocal relationships with families, professional colleagues, and community partners in support of, and as advocates for, each child's learning, well-being, and the arts.

The program's guiding principles highlight the key concepts from the program philosophy regarding the valued attributes that the program aims to develop in each of its graduates. During the self-study process, it was recognized that while faculty have primary responsibility for applying the guiding principles, others in the department, including lab school staff and teachers, artists in residence, and administrators also play a role in supporting student development. This realization supported the insertion of "staff" into the guiding principles as it underscores how the program takes collective responsibility for developing students' knowledge, dispositions, and skills.
