ABSTRACT

Purpose: We report findings from a survey of elementary teachers regarding reading instruction. The purpose was to examine teachers' beliefs about how children in the first 7 years of schooling develop reading comprehension skills and to characterize the self-reported practices and strategies they use to support children to comprehend connected text.

Method: A web-based survey was used to collect data from 284 Australian elementary teachers about their beliefs and practices regarding reading comprehension instruction. Selected Likert-scale items were aggregated to determine the degree to which participants held "child-centered" or "content-centered" views of reading instruction.

Results: Australian elementary school teachers hold a wide range of beliefs about reading instruction, some of which are in direct opposition to each other. Our findings indicate low consensus about what elements of instructional practice are useful in classrooms or how time should be apportioned to different tasks. Commercial programs had significant penetration in schools, and many participants reported using multiple commercial programs, with varying degrees of pedagogical harmony. Participants indicated that their most common source of knowledge about reading instruction was their own personal research, with few nominating university teacher education as a primary source of knowledge or expertise.

Conclusions: Little agreement exists within the Australian elementary teacher community regarding the ways that reading skills can and should be taught. There is significant room for teacher practice to have improved theoretical underpinnings and to develop a consistent repertoire of classroom practices aligned with these.

Reading instruction is a highly contested topic in education, in terms of both its theoretical underpinnings and pedagogical approaches (Castles et al., 2018; Chall, 1967; Hoffman et al., 2020; Kim, 2008; Pearson, 2004; Rowe, 2005; Shanahan, 2020). The "reading wars," prevalent in other English-speaking countries, have also impacted Australian academic, policy, media, and classroom practice arenas over the past 50 years (Buckingham & Meeks, 2019; Rowe, 2005). Despite recommendations about effective reading practices made by national reviews undertaken in three English-speaking countries since 2000 (National Institute of Child Health and Human Development, 2000; Rose, 2006; Rowe, 2005), reading instruction in Australian classrooms is still highly contested, and this debate impacts both the teaching of decoding and the teaching of comprehension. Notwithstanding the divisiveness of the debate, as reflected by the three national inquiries, the weight of evidence on reading instruction favors explicit teaching, using a scope and sequence. This runs counter to the prevailing balanced literacy dominance and instead reflects the science of reading, as reflected by the Simple View of Reading (SVR; Gough & Tunmer, 1986; Hoover & Gough, 1990).

According to the SVR (Gough & Tunmer, 1986; Hoover & Gough, 1990), reading comprehension is described
