Abstract: Microbial pesticides can be significantly improved by adjuvants. At present, microbial pesticide formulations are mainly wettable powders and suspension concentrations, which are usually produced with adjuvants such as surfactants, carriers, protective agents, and nutritional adjuvants. Surfactants can improve the tension between liquid pesticides and crop surfaces, resulting in stronger permeability and wettability of the formulations. Carriers are inert components of loaded or diluted pesticides, which can control the release of active components at appropriate times. Protective agents are able to help microorganisms to resist in adverse environments. Nutritional adjuvants are used to provide nutrients for microorganisms in microbial pesticides. Most of the adjuvants used in microbial pesticides still refer to those of chemical pesticides. However, some adjuvants may have harmful effects on non-target organisms and ecological environments. Herein, in order to promote research and improvement of microbial pesticides, the types of microbial pesticide formulations were briefly reviewed, and research progress of adjuvants and their applications in microbial pesticides were highlighted, the challenges and the future perspectives towards sustainable green adjuvants of microbial pesticides were also discussed in this review.

1. Introduction

In modern agriculture and forestry, pesticides have always played important roles in ensuring agricultural production as a necessity to increase grain production, regulate crop growth, and control plant pests and diseases [1,2]. Following economic globalization, the problems of chemical pesticide residue have attracted the attention of many countries. Many of them have increasingly strict trade standards for pesticide residue in agricultural products. Ideally, pesticides must be lethal to target pests, but not to non-target species, including humans [1,3,4]. Microbial pesticides, mainly produced with naturally occurring bacteria, fungi (including some protozoa and yeasts), and viruses, have been attracting widespread attention due to their advantages in target specificity, environmental safety, efficacy, biodegradability, and applicability in integrated pest management programs [5–7].

The United States is the first country in the world to manage pesticide additives. In 1954, the United States FDA implemented the ADI limit. In 1987, according to the policy of “Reducing the potential adverse effects of the use of pesticide products containing toxic inert ingredients”, the United States EPA conducted classified list management on the toxicity and exposure hazards of additives (divided into four categories) [8,9]. The European Union, through the implementation of REACH system, divides pesticide additives
