

Finally, the “notebook,” aspect is the important piece in the puzzling relationship James Holmes had with Dr. Lynn Fenton. It really “raises as many questions as it answers” (23). Allegedly, the notebook contained stick drawings of some individuals shooting others. Legal analyst Scott Robinson wonders: “Is it a manifesto or an apology? If it includes drawings that are sufficiently damaged as to be from someone who appears mentally ill, it could assist defense in a not-guilty-by-reason-of-insanity defense. If it appears to be the work of someone who knows exactly what they are doing, and they knew it was wrong, that could help the prosecution” (23). Since the defense is pleading not guilty by reason of insanity, the interpretation of the drawings and the other contents of the sent package will be of absolutely crucial importance. Either the prosecution will gain the advantage or the defense will get the upper hand in the insanity plea. The questions raised are a natural product of the vague and scattered information provided by the media with regards to the details of the circumstances in which the package was sent. When and where was the package sent? When did the package arrive and when was it actually opened? A source from the Business Insider claims the package went unopened until the Monday after the shooting took place (25). While the timeline is important, the substantial aspects of the notebook are the drawings and their interpretation. On June 10, 2013 the notebook was accepted as evidence by the court even though defense lawyer Daniel King claimed the notebook is “protected by a doctor-patient relationship.” I believe this is a definite win of the prosecution, which is trying to prove that Holmes was sane beyond a reasonable doubt. Interestingly (it is actually among only five states utilizing the M’Naghten insanity test), Colorado state law dictates that the burden of responsibility falls on the prosecution when it comes to insanity pleas. The prosecution has to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant is not insane and thus should be held criminally responsible for his crime (37). Usually, after the infamous case of John W. Hinckley, Jr. (6), the burden of responsibility falls on the defense, which is obliged to prove the perpetrator is insane beyond a reasonable doubt.

Moving on, regardless of the drawings, the act of sending the notebook to Dr. Fenton should be evaluated and taken into consideration for the James Holmes case. Brian Levin, a professor of criminal justice says that “it may very well have been a last-ditch cry for help or recognition... a cry for validation” (23). Maybe he just wanted to grab Dr. Fenton’s attention and threaten to act on it. Also choosing his psychiatrist as the recipient was not accidental but deliberate. There is a strange dynamic between mental doctors and their patients especially those suffering from a major mental disorder and not just a personality disorder or the standard, small-scaled depression, for instance. Furthermore, the package along with other evidence may be signs of contemplation. Although he had all his arsenal of weapons and ammunition assembled at that point, there is a chance he might not have gone through with it. This is the only logical explanation as to why he sent the package to Dr. Fenton considering that the drawings did not reflect any sort of political manifesto and they were not the product of paranoid, persecutory delusions (like in the case of Cho in the Virginia Tech Massacre). This explanation is further backed up by the alleged phone call Holmes only nine minutes before he entered the Aurora 16 Century Theater armed. Unfortunately, Dr. Fenton was unable to take that call and stated that she
