

The grip

Side view

The grips on the cars have changed a lot over the years. The grips are attached to the floor of the car by a carry bar. They perform much like a vice-grip when grabbing the cable. The dies that grip the cable are replaced regularly after several days.

How the grip works

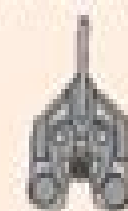

Partial release: During passenger and other stops, the grip lever is put about half way forward. The adjustable jaws are opened slightly. The cable slides through the grips and the car does not move. This permits stops without having to pick up the cable each time.

As the grip lever is pulled back, the dies squeeze the cable harder and the car accelerates up to cable speed, which is a little more than 9.5 mph. The original cars in 1873 went about 4 mph.

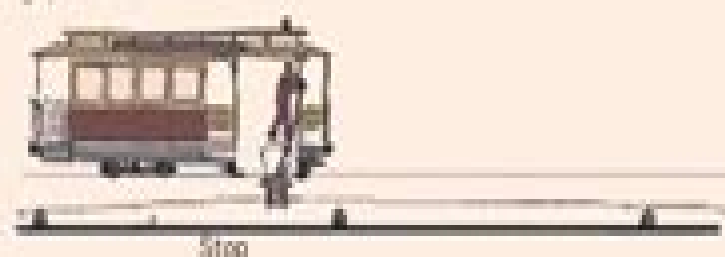

The farther back the hand lever is pulled, the stronger the hold the grip has on the cable. Starting is smooth because the cable is lubricated with synthetic lubricants (pine tar was used until 1982) that liquefies and then vaporized under the heat and pressure, ultimately giving a metal-to-metal contact.

Full release: To drop the cable out of the grip, the lever is pushed all the way forward, opening the jaws fully. This is done at cable crossings, switches, let-go curves and end of the lines.

Traditional books and manuals can be costly, especially if you need to purchase several of them for educational or professional purposes.
