The Early H.G. Wells Bernard Bergonzi, 1961-12-15 This is a sensitive study of Wells imaginative development during his formative years It comes at a time when interest in H G Wells early writing is beginning to revive owing no doubt to the current translation into reality of some aspects of science fiction Mr Bergonzi examines Wells early fiction from surviving student writings of the late eighties to 1901 when he published The First Men in the Moon his last significant scientific romance and Anticipations his first systematic non fictional treatise The main emphasis of his study falls on the scientific romances of the nineties which are examined in detail In addition to literary analysis relevant source material and reviews which show how contemporaries received Wells work are noted Wells early attitude to science is shown to have been deeply ambivalent as is apparent in his successive uses of the Frankenstein archetype His intellectual attitudes tended towards scepticism and pessimism rather than to the utopian optimism associated with his later career These romances reflect in imaginative and non discursive form some of the major preoccupations of late Victorian England the impact of Darwinism of Socialism and an increasing lack of national self confidence Mr Bergonzi sees Wells as essentially a fin de si cle myth maker and he argues that it is this aspect of Wells work which most requires attention if he is to be remembered in the future Two early pieces by Wells now unobtainable elsewhere are given in an Appendix One The Chronic Argonauts a fragment of a fantastic novel written at the age of 21 is the earliest draft of The Time Machine
