When and why was Remarks on Colour written – and why is it important to know?

Der Philosoph will die Geographie der Begriffe beherrschen.
(MS 137, 63a, dated 1 July 1948)¹

The publicity material on the cover of the paperback edition of Remarks on Colour states that “[t]he principal theme [of the work] is the features of different colours, of different kinds of colour (metallic colour, the colour of flames, etc.) and of luminosity”.² This description, in all likelihood approved, if not written, by the editor, G.E.M. Anscombe, is misleading. While many of Wittgenstein’s remarks are devoted to the nature and motley character of colour with more than a few on the features of different colours, kinds of colour and luminosity, there is much more in the book, and readers coming to it with the publicity material in mind will almost inevitably get the wrong impression. What is said to be the principal theme is at most a minor one, and it is far from self-evident that Wittgenstein is, as also intimated on the cover, out “to destroy the traditional idea that colour is a simple and logically uniform kind of thing”. An examination of when and why Wittgenstein drafted the remarks of the book shows him to be centrally motivated by questions concerning transparency, questions unmentioned in the publicity material and mostly missed or disregarded in the secondary literature.

Remarks on Colour comprises observations that Wittgenstein penned during the last fifteen or so months of his life. His literary executors – Anscombe, Rush Rhees and G.H. von Wright – apparently reckoned “the whole of this material might well be published, as it gives a clear sample of first-draft writing and subsequent selection”. Anscombe allows that much of the material written not subsequently recycled is “of great interest” but decided – this is more obvious in the German version of her preface – that the chosen “method of publication involves the least editorial intervention” (Editor’s Preface). Judging from how she ended up presenting the material, her thought was that Wittgenstein’s remarks would be most satisfactorily published in three separate units – Part I extracted from MS 176, Part II extracted from MS 172 and Part III extracted from MS 173 (for catalogue numbers see von Wright 1993b). Not without reason Anscombe seems to have considered the relatively small number of other remarks

² References in the text are to the published text. The numbering of the remarks is the editor’s, not Wittgenstein’s.
