

Reformulating Special Education:
Policy & Implementation from School Level to District Level

W. Russell A. Skusek

Abstract

This paper discusses the challenges of reformulating special education policy and implementation from the school level to the district level. It begins by examining the current state of special education in the United States, highlighting the disparities in funding and outcomes across different states and districts. The author then discusses the importance of developing a shared vision and goals for special education reform, and the need for collaboration between schools, districts, and state agencies. The paper also explores the role of data in informing policy and implementation decisions, and the importance of ongoing evaluation and monitoring. Finally, the author offers some suggestions for how to move forward with reformulating special education policy and implementation, emphasizing the need for a systemic approach that addresses the root causes of the problem.

Reforming Special Education Policy Implementation From State Level To Street Level:

Reforming Special Education Richard Weatherley, 1979 Focusing on Massachusetts innovative special education reform law Chapter 766 Reforming Special Education traces the complex processes through which an ostensibly universalistic and equitable policy can produce a biased distribution of public benefits favoring affluent clients Reforming Special Education examines three Massachusetts school systems and seven schools within those systems to determine whether laws formulated to alter practices in educating children who are deaf blind retarded and physically handicapped actually result in fair and uniform treatment of children with special needs or whether they just create more work for school personnel The book discusses individual and community wealth as factors in the allocation of funds Despite Massachusetts equalizing formula it points out that rich districts often fare better than poor ones because they have the resources and sophistication necessary to challenge funding decisions The book also reveals that bureaucrats who are charged with carrying out the changes are victimized by new laws which for lack of resources they cannot hope to put into effect Because the street level bureaucrats front line personnel develop informal means of coping with these problems and with their jobs they distort the policy they are charged with implementing and become policy makers in their own right Weatherley concludes that policy initiatives must take into account potential effects on the daily work routines of those charged with implementing them These findings have dramatic implications for all human service bureaucracies where front line staff interact with the public hospitals police departments public welfare and employment offices mental health centers and lower courts Students of public policy educators social workers or anyone involved in public service employment will find this a scholarly yet highly readable account of the organizational constraints to bureaucratic reform
